IMDZ: Cellectis R&D Day Highlights Immuno-Oncology Promise--Elements Of CAR-T Which IMDZ's Platform Could Potentially Differentiate From

Brian Abrahams, M.D., Senior Analyst (212) 214-8060

Sector Rating: Biotechnology, Market Weight

Today (9/11), we attended the R&D Day of Cellectis, a preclinical-stage biotech developing "second generation" CAR-T cell therapies, combining CAR-T technology and gene editing technology to optimize efficacy, safety, manufacturing, and treatment logistics. The meeting was very well attended, which speaks to the high level of interest in CAR-T technology and immune-oncology in general, and we believe there are potential read-throughs relevant for IMDZ, a company whose immuno-oncology approach we continue to believe is differentiated and underappreciated.

While Cellectis' CAR-T platform utilizes allogeneic donor T cells (vs. autologous cells used by most of CAR-T platforms) to streamline the manufacturing process and enable an "off-the-shelf" therapy, still, a KOL from MD Anderson suggested that manufacturing and logistics involved in delivering a complex and novel therapeutic could be the biggest challenge for the CAR-T technology, in his view, where even if the technology proves to be efficacious in clinical trials, industrialized manufacturing and delivery could be a major bottleneck for the technology. Though it is difficult to directly compare IMDZ's ZVex platform to CAR-T, we believe ZVex's in vivo delivery and "off-the-shelf" approach could provide some advantages over a more "personalized" and complex genetic (viral gene transduction and/or gene editing) and immune (lymphodepletion) manipulations.

Safety remains one of the biggest clinical uncertainties associated with CAR-T, highlighted during the presentations, where artificially engineered T cells could potentially have deleterious effects on tissues due the uncontrolled hyperactivation of CAR-T cells, potentially fatal GVHD (in allogeneic approach), or autoimmune response to the CAR-T itself. We believe IMDZ's targeting of endogenous DCs and T cells could enable similar immune-targeting of cancer but in a more physiologic way, potentially providing safety advantages.

BOTTOM LINE: While we believe CAR-T is one of the most exciting immunotherapy approaches and Cellectis is well worth watching, we continue to view IMDZ's ZVex immunotherapy platform as differentiated, providing some of the same potential for targeted immune destruction of cancers as CAR-T with possible administration/safety advantages.
